

Prescription help

Goodrx.com has great discounts on medication and shows you where it is the cheapest. There is a code on there that the pharmacy enters into their computer to provide the discount. So, they would just need to show that printed or on their phone to the pharmacy.

I worked as a medical social worker prior to being a counselor. Some drug companies offer medication through an indigent drug program. That all must be done through the doctor's office and is usually based on income and insurance.

Call you local hospital and ask for a case management nurse. They would have all of this info.

You might also call 211 and see if they keep a listing.

<http://www.indianadrugcard.com/medication-pricing.php>

<https://in.pparx.org/>

Also depends upon what medicine you are needing the discount for.

Walgreens has a discount program and at Meijer and Walmart many prescriptions are free. Also, if the parent has a doctor, have them ask their doc for samples.

There is goodrx.com that we have used as a family. Sometimes it is cheaper than with our insurance and sometimes it is cheaper to use the coupon through that website.

If they are low to moderate income suggest they apply for Medicaid. Even if they are not approved, they have a chance at the HIP program which dramatically reduces prescription costs.

I've had luck calling the manufacturer directly. Some of them have programs, but they are generally individual company sponsored.

I've had some luck with the website below in the past. Not sure if their prescription is listed but it's an option.
<http://www.xubex.com>

Indianadrugcard.com.

What medication is it for? She can always go to that's drugs website and see if they offer any discount or free programs. For example, the makers of quillivant for ADHD offer a discount and free program for their medication if you meet the standards and apply.

Have you tried Brightpoint? Or calling 211? One of those should be able to give you some help.

Walgreens has a Perscription Savings Club. More information can be found here:
https://www.walgreens.com/pharmacy/psc/psc_overview_page.jsp needymeds.org is another site. I checked with CVS. parents can actually take both discount cards in and they will give them the biggest discount from the two sites.

The app GoodRx allows you to search for the pharmacies in your area that offer the cheapest price for the prescription you're looking for from your doctor.

Familywize.org

Specific medication websites sometimes provide parents with discounts or samples.

Calling your family physician and requesting assistance or another comparable medication that is less expensive can be another option.

www.needymeds.com is a great resource for financial assistance with medication. One can find links to companies/agencies that will provide medications free of charge or at a reduced charge. Just type in the medication and the site will connect with resources available for that medication.

App: onerx can also supply discounted medications.

211 is a great resource. Just call 211 and they can direct you to the resources you need in our area I may not be aware of.